Introduction

The Canadian Research Index - Microlog puts all of Canada's hard-to-find government and research literature at your fingertips. Canadian Research Index in print is a monthly indexing and abstracting service. An electronic version on CD-ROM or via the Internet is also available. Microlog represents our fulltext document service. Most titles included in Canadian Research Index are available in paper as well as microfiche format. Together, these services are a powerful tool for finding Canadian report publications.

The Canadian Research Index includes scientific and technical research papers in physical, natural and social sciences. It also includes policy papers, important statistical publications, and annual reports.

Documents issued in English or French are catalogued, indexed and abstracted in the language of the publication, while bilingual documents are catalogued, indexed and abstracted in both languages.

Every effort is made to ensure the currency of the index. For instance, documents appearing in the checklist of Canadian Government Publications are delivered by the Microlog Service approximately two months after publication of the list.

SOURCES

- government publications from the federal, provincial and municipal levels
- depository publications of reference value
- non-depository publications issued by government organizations, laboratories and research centres
- non-profit organizations, educational institutions and research groups
- some monographs and serials issued by Statistics Canada

ORGANIZATION

Canadian Research Index comprises the following sections:

Titles and abstracts: A full bibliographic citation and a descriptive abstract for each title.

Corporate name index: Access by controlled format corporate names based on Canadian Authorities.

Personal name index: Access by personal name.

Subject index: Subject terms based on Library of Congress and Canadian Subject Headings are assigned to each document. A cross-referencing structure assists searchers.

Series titles: Lists by title and numbers all reports in a series; series are available as an on-going subscription or retrospective collection.

Microfiche collections: Lists contents of each fiche collection for quick reference. These collections can be used as current awareness lists in broad subject areas to notify users of new acquisitions.

ELECTRONIC ACCESS

The full Canadian Research Index file from 1982 to date is available in electronic formats on the SilverPlatter SPIRS platform. It is accessible on CD; it may be licensed for network use on a local server or on a SilverPlatter ERL server; and it is available for Internet subscription. Reports may be ordered through the National Technical Information Service in the U.S.A., or directly through IHS/Micromedia's Global Information Centre. Introduction

Microlog : Index de recherche du Canada met à votre disposition toutes les publications du gouvernement et les travaux de recherche difficiles à se procurer. L'Index de recherche du Canada imprimé est un service mensuel d'indexation et de résumés. Une version électronique est également offerte sur CD-ROM ou dans Internet. Microlog représente notre service de documents en texte intégral. La plupart des titres figurant dans l'Index sont disponibles sous forme imprimée et sur microfiche. Ces services combinés constituent un outil très efficace pour retrouver les publications des différents gouvernements du Canada.

L'Index contient entre autres des recherches en sciences physiques, naturelles et sociales, des énoncés de politique, des statistiques et des rapports annuels.

Les ouvrages publiés en français ou en anglais sont indexés et résumés dans la langue de publication; les ouvrages bilingues sont traités dans les deux langues.

De vastes efforts sont déployés pour assurer la pertinence de l'index. Par exemple, on peut obtenir les documents qui figurent sur la Liste des publications du gouvernement du Canada environ deux mois après leur parution sur cette liste.

SOURCES

- publications fédérales, provinciales et municipales
- publications déposées servant de référence
- publications non déposées publiées par les organismes gouvernementaux, les laboratoires et les centres de recherche
- publications d'organismes à but non lucratif, d'établissements d'enseignement et de groupes de recherche
- certaines monographies et publication en série publiées par Statistique Canada

ORGANISATION DE L'INDEX

Titres et résumés: tous les titres sont catalogués et accompagnés d'un résumé descriptif.

Index des dénominations sociales: donne un accès par dénominations sociales fondées sur les vedettes d'autorité du service Canadiana.

Index des noms: donne un accès par auteur.

Index des matières: des descripteurs fondés sur les vedettes matières des documents Library of Congress Subject Headings et Canadian Subject Headings sont associés à chaque publication; un réseau de renvois facilite la recherche.

Titres de collections: tous les rapports publiés en série sont classés par titre et numéro. Ces documents sont disponibles par le biais d'un abonnement permanent et ils sont aussi intégrés à une collection rétrospective.

Collections de microfiches: chaque collection apparaît dans une section séparée pour faciliter la recherche. Ces listes peuvent aussi servir à renseigner les usagers sur les nouveautés.

Sample CRI Search

"How can a person from a foreign country qualify for refugee status in Canada?"

The researcher can search in CRI as in any library catalogue - by subject, author and title.
Because the index is bilingual, searching can be done in English or in French.

Recherche type avec IRC

"Comment une personne d'un pays étranger peut-elle demander le statut de réfugié au Canada?"

La méthode de recherche dans IRC est la même que dans une bibliothèque, puisque les documents sont indexés par auteur, par sujet et par titre. L'index étant bilingue, la consultation peut se faire en français ou en anglais.

Describes design and construction of an acousto-mechanical model of the hearing system used to evaluate the acoustic attenuation provided by hearing protectors. The design is based on the KEMAR mannequin and approximates the physical dimensions and the acoustical eardrum impedance of the median human adult. The model consists of a torso unit, a head unit, two neck modules, and three ear modules. The influence of the artificial skin, of the neck compliance, and of the pinna on the attenuation of five earmuffs and five earplugs was investigated in a diffuse sound field. The effects of intra-aural skin on the attenuation of earplugs are noted. The attenuation measurements were also compared to the subjective REAT method and a preliminary study was undertaken in a free progressive sound field to evaluate hearing protectors in terms of both their amplitude and phase attenuation characteristics.

Study methodology involved collection of retrospective data using a chart review process and the objective assessment of the medical necessity of hospital admissions and days of care, the latter using the InterQual Criteria Development/Revision Process. The population studied included a sample of 150 records of acute-care patients from all acute-care hospitals having at least 2,000 adult medical separations and from a random selection of 25% of hospitals having 200-2,000 separations. The study was designed to assist in answering such questions as what levels of care are required, how and where can those levels be provided, whether there is a need to expand outpatient facilities, and whether more services are needed for the terminally ill.

Decreasing revenues and increasing service delivery responsibilities are prompting many local governments to turn to alternative means of delivering local services. This report documents Canadian and other local government experiences in using alternative service delivery practices; evaluates a series of Canadian local government case studies in the use of such practices, based on the criteria of efficiency, effectiveness, accountability, and equity; and discusses the existing provincial legislation that either prohibits or facilitates alternative service delivery practices. The alternatives evaluated are grouped in three major categories: contracting out to the private sector, intergovernmental agreements, and franchising; subsidy/fees, including vouchers, user fees, and subsidy agreements; and the use of volunteers and facilitating self-help. Key issues considered in the case studies include the reasons for adopting an alternative service delivery method, effect of changes in delivery on costs, reasons for cost savings, public response, and changes in service quality.

This report analyzes the professional (but non-technical) training of nuclear power plant operators, focusing on the nuclear power plant as a socio-technical system. It considers the management techniques which have been applied to improve performance in socio-technical systems. Total quality management and quality circles are reviewed as modern developments stemming from early efforts to improve both the quality and efficiency of industrial life. The role of training is also reviewed and criteria for evaluating different kinds of training are discussed. The report also discusses the cognitive abilities and the individual differences that are relevant to skilled process control. It analyzes both the training experiences and work experiences which contribute to the cognitive differences between novice and experienced process controllers. The report concludes with a summary of the goals of professional training and with recommendations concerning the uses of training, simulators, and in-house information feedback to improve the expectations, motivations, skills, and cognitive abilities of nuclear power plant operators.

This is the final report of the Assessment of the Aquatic Effects of Mining in Canada (AQUAMIN), an initiative established to examine the effectiveness of the Metal Mining Liquid Effluent Regulations (MMLER) by conducting an assessment of the environmental effects of mining and to formulate recommendations on the basis of this assessment. The assessment was based on a review of over 700 reports relating to over 95 Canadian mine sites and on detailed case studies conducted for 18 sites. The report summarizes the key findings regarding the effects of mining on aquatic ecosystems, including effects on water and sediment quality, benthos, fish, and plankton; the state of environmental monitoring in the Canadian mining industry; and the effectiveness of MMLER, including its applicability and the environmental parameters covered. It then presents recommendations regarding amendments to MMLER, site-specific environmental requirements, environmental effects monitoring and its implementation, revisions to the Environmental Code of Practice for Mines, information gaps, and research needs.

Total area of the Licence is about 243,000 hectares, of which only 35,000 are operable. Audit work included both intensive ground-based examination and assessments from the air of selected roads and cutblocks in the licence area. In addition, operational planning documents were studied to verify their consistency with forest development plans and their appropriateness for the sites examined. Significant situations of non-compliance with the Forest Practices Code are identified.

Reviews the activities surrounding the creation of IPC International Power Corporation and its joint venture with BC Hydro for the development of international power projects, including the Raiwind thermal power plant in Pakistan. The Raiwind project provoked widespread public discussion in British Columbia in 1996 due to the involvement of Cayman Islands companies in the project structure and the intermingling of public and private interests in the project, particularly with respect to allegations that an IPC share offering benefited insiders of government and BC Hydro. The review considers the following issues: the project structure and planning process; the involvement of offshore corporations; Canadian private sector investment in the project; commercial and financial aspects of the project; conduct of the directors and officers involved, and conflicts of interest; and corporate governance and accountability. The appendix includes details of the Raiwind project, discussion of the income tax con-

For negative pressure type containments in nuclear plants, the final engineered barrier to the release of airborne radioactive material is the filter section of the Emergency Filtered Air Discharge System (EFADS). This report examines the adequacy of available experimental evidence, both national and international, to determine the behaviour of EFADS components under design conditions. The Darlington Nuclear Generating Station EFADS is used as a model. Relevant Canadian and foreign standards, regulatory requirements, and results of Canadian and international experimental and test programs are reviewed. The current knowledge of EFADS component behaviour is assessed for operating conditions based on the safety analysis and the operating procedures. The safety margin to component failure is also examined for postulated harsh conditions based on available experimental data. Recommendations are provided for optimizing the in-situ and laboratory test programs and procedures in support of EFADS operation.

La brucellose fait peser une menace, légère, mais non négligeable, sur la santé du caribou et des peuples du nord canadien qui dépendent de cet animal. La présence de cette maladie a été confirmée pour la première fois dans l'Arctique canadien dans les années 1950. Dans ce rapport, on trouvera un aperçu de la question de la brucellose dans l'Arctique, ainsi que des besoins futurs en matière de recherche. Nous espérons qu'il stimulera les efforts de recherche visant à comprendre la brucellose et encouragera de nouvelles études sur cette maladie tant chez les humains que chez les animaux sauvages.

This paper examines the state of three emerging technology clusters in western Canada: biotechnology, information technology, and advanced materials/advanced manufacturing. The study process sought to clarify the structure of the economy and the role presently and potentially played by these three enabling technology clusters. The ultimate goal was to find better ways for industry to use technology opportunities to improve the economy and quality of life in western Canada, and to see how to engage both private and public sectors in concrete actions to create vibrant enabling technology clusters in the region. Challenges and opportunities facing the three clusters that currently drive the western economy (energy/mining, forest products, and agri-food) are also discussed.

Assembled information is also interpreted in the context of flyway and nation and related to the wider Canada goose picture. Fifteen chapters present and discuss information from the individual goose staging and wintering areas in the Maritimes. These are followed by chapters on the few Canada geese that breed there, on the habitats and foods used by staging and wintering geese, on the longer movements of geese as shown by band recoveries and neck-collar sightings, and on the annual kill of Canada geese by hunters and subsistence users in eastern Canada. A final chapter then discusses the place of these goose stocks in the wider Atlantic flyway Canada goose populations.

What has been attempted in this document is a bibliography of published primary sources and secondary works on Canadian military topics, excluding poetry and fiction, covering the period from Confederation to the present. Entries in the bibliography represent printed monographs, books and pamphlets, and serial titles. The prime criteria of inclusion were that the work be chiefly or uniquely both Canadian and military in its contents. Many in-house publications, of the training pamphlet or regulations type, have been included, but only insofar as they tell us something of the armed forces themselves, rather than details of tactical doctrine or of pieces of equipment. Works by or about Canadians serving with the armed forces of other countries have been included, as well as materials relating to the military history of Newfoundland since 1867.

Presents results of in-situ experiments designed to closely examine the relationship between carbon and oxygen estimates of phytoplankton primary production. All samples were collected at a single station in the Bedford Basin, Nova Scotia, where the water depth is 70 metres. The site was chosen because of the existing large body of biological, physical, and chemical data on samples collected there. Primary productivity was measured using the carbon-14 method, the oxygen evolution method, and the Delta-CO2 method. Other parameters measured include chlorophyll, organic particulates, nutrients, and total incident radiation.

It includes information on the regional geological framework and stratigraphy as well as a prediction for undiscovered gas resources based on geological and statistical analysis. The second part uses selected information from part I and applies an investment decision methodology to estimate the quantity of economically recoverable resources under a set of assumptions pertaining to technology, costs, and future economic parameters.

La collectivité intégrée : un mode d'aménagement qui reconnaît la complexité, est une étude qui fait le point sur les nouvelles normes d'aménagement en Amérique du Nord. On a reconnu la nécessité d'aborder le développement communautaire autrement que par l'application de normes conventionnelles. Des nouvelles normes encourageraient les formes d'aménagement qui sont plus abordables, décourageraient l'étalement urbain, tiennent compte de l'environnement, appuient les transports en commun, réduisent la dépendance de l'automobile et créent des collectivités plus habitables. Ce document présente une étude des nouvelles normes d'aménagement foncier. Nous passons en revue la documentation, examinons quatre études de cas, établissons un ensemble de principes et de directives pour mettre en oeuvre une nouvelle façon d'aborder les normes d'aménagement et faisons la démonstration des possibilités d'une nouvelle méthode par la conception d'une collectivité fictive appelée la collectivité intégrée.

Reviews and compares selected aspects of the tax treatment of foreign-source income in five countries: Canada, Australia, France, Germany, and the United States. Each review follows a common format for easy comparison: an overview; foreign-source income earned directly; foreign-source income earned indirectly; and enforcement and administrative issues. Emphasis is on the structural features of each country's tax system with regard to dividends from foreign corporations, controlled foreign corporation rules, and foreign investment funds. Important considerations include the geographic source of income and the allocation of expenses between domestic and foreign sources. A series of tables at the end of the report summarizes the structural features of the tax treatment of foreign-source income in the five countries. CA CO DE EX PA SS

Computational evaluation of decoupling and damping materials

Summarizes the development of theoretical tools to evaluate the effect of damping and decoupling materials on the sound radiation from finite size plates, with the intended application being ship noise reduction. The plates considered are simply supported baffled plates with fluid on one side and backed with air on the other, excited with either a point force or a plane wave. The fluid loading due to water is taken into account using an original method for the calculation of the radiation impedance, allowing for high frequency results with short computational times and no convergence problems. For decoupling materials, the decoupling layer was modelled by evenly distributed, locally reacting springs on the plate. Theoretical models for two- and three-layer plates are proposed for viscoelastic damping, using the variational approach and solved by the Rayleigh-Ritz method. Experimental verification of the models for viscoelastic damping was carried out for several cases by measurement of the mean square velocity over the plate using laser Doppler velocimetry. Experimental and theoretical results are compared. CA ND PS SC

Describes and presents simulation results from numerical models of the transport and fate of environmental chemicals in northern Alberta rivers. The models were developed using the USEPA WASP modelling system and were structured as one-dimensional (longitudinal) models with separate, interacting water column and bed sediment compartments. Seven selected organic chemicals were simulated over 1992-93 for the Athabasca River and over 1990-91 for the Wapiti/Smoky River system. Chemicals simulated included 2,3,7,8-tetrachloro dibenzofuran, dehydroabietic acid, and phenanthrene. The models were first calibrated for sodium and total suspended solids. Organic chemicals were simulated using a set of environmental fate constants developed from a literature search, numerical estimation software, and estimation from field data. Results of initial simulations were compared to observed data and adjustments made to selected constants to improve the calibration.

Describes and presents simulation results using a revised model simulating the fate of contaminants in the Athabasca River. The revised fate model allows predictive sediment transport simulation within the WASP4 model framework, predicts resuspension from hydraulic information supplied by WASP4 and from user-supplied sediment characteristics, and can be applied to different flow conditions without having to re-describe sediment transport rates. Several simulations were run using input files from the original model calibration. Program listings of subroutines are included.

Contaminated site liability report : recommended principles for a consistent approach across Canada

Canada Council of Ministers of the Environment, Core Group on Contaminated Site Liability. Winnipeg : The Group, 1993. 15 p. (Report / Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment ; CCME-SPC-CGCSL-67E) ISBN 0-919074-41-3 MICROLOG 97-04501 (1 fiche)

The liability for cleanup or remediation of contaminated sites is an issue causing difficulty in current attempts to achieve a sustainable environment and economy. This report presents a set of recommended principles to provide a model framework on which governments can develop legislation and regulations regarding contaminated sites and which will promote and facilitate a consistent approach to the issue of environmental liability. The first five principles are those that contain the general policies which should form the basis of legislation, including the polluter-pay principle, fairness, openness, and sustainable development. This is followed by specific principles regarding such matters as statutory exemptions from liability, recovery of public funds spent in remediation, allocation of responsibility, designation of contaminated sites, and compliance certification.

Continuous water temperature monitoring in the Nicola River, B.C., 1994 : implications of high measured temperatures for anadromous salmonids

By L.C. Walthers and J.C. Nener. Vancouver, BC : Dept. of Fisheries & Oceans, 1997. vii, 65 p. : Ill., Bibl. (Canadian technical report of fisheries and aquatic sciences / Canada. Dept. of Fisheries & Oceans ; no. 2158 ISSN 0706-6457) On cover: Fraser River Action Plan. CCG-P no. Fs 97-6/2158E MICROLOG 97-04577 (1 fiche)

The Nicola River drains part of British Columbia's interior plateau and supports populations of coho and chinook salmon which spawn during summer and early fall, and rear for a year or more in relatively small streams prior to seaward migration. Previous studies have indicated that high water temperatures in the Nicola watershed are a constraint for salmon production and that local variations in water temperature are a major factor influencing salmonid distribution. This report describes and presents results of a program established to obtain continuous water temperature data from six locations in the Nicola watershed. Results presented include information about upstream/downstream temperature patterns, diurnal fluctuations, and duration of temperatures which exceed critical thresholds for salmonids. The temperature data provided also indicate conditions which can be expected in other central interior fish-bearing rivers. Implications of observed thermal conditions for salmonids are discussed and strategies for mitigating water temperatures in the Nicola River are recommended.

Contribution of industrial, municipal, agricultural and groundwater sources to nutrient export, Athabasca, Wapiti and Smoky rivers, 1980 to 1993

The aim of this report is to assess the sources of nitrogen and phosphorus to the Athabasca and Wapiti/Smoky rivers and evaluate the need to consider groundwater contributions when undertaking simulation modelling of chemical parameters of the Athabasca River during winter. To address the first objective, longitudinal trends in nitrogen and phosphorus were examined for each river system in relation to point source inputs and the contributions of anthropogenic point sources and agricultural activity in the rivers' nutrient loads were quantified. The importance of groundwater during winter was assessed by examining hydrologic mass balances and changes in dominant ion proportions. Results are presented of analyses of long-term values of nutrients from ten sites on the Athabasca and three sites on the Wapiti/Smoky rivers.

The study utilizes growth and nutrient data collected 1969-93 from a fire-origin, boreal outlier jack pine stand located near Thessalon, Ontario. This report documents the population decline which affected small Canadian communities between 1981 and 1986. It first reviews population trends from 1978 to 1986, noting the effect of the 1980-82 recession on the many small towns which grew during the resource boom of the 1970s. More precisely, the report reveals the decline in population in 182 communities, mainly in those having one to three thousand inhabitants. The regions of Canada most affected by this decline are noted. The second section reviews the economic conditions of the early 1980s and identifies the economic sectors responsible for population decline. The third section identifies 55 census variables which are used to establish the relevant characteristics which make the 182 communities differ markedly from one another although they share a somewhat similar economic base. The report concludes with discussion of programs designed to alleviate regional disparities.

These equations constitute part of a model of the North American solid wood sector. Factors that influence the replacement costs are also examined, and variables such as capacity, prices, and manufacturing costs are used to estimate Tobin's q model (Zhang and Buongiorno, 1993) of capacity expansion. Data for the study were collected via a literature search of trade journals for announcements of investments in new mills and mill modernizations. Results are given in terms of cost per thousand board feet of new capacity.

Research questions are addressed initially in a series of case studies of countries and coalitions, and finally in a synthetic fashion in the concluding chapter. Such questions include the context in which developing countries must bargain, the effects of balance of payments crises, the interests of developing countries in bilateral and multilateral openings, and how bargaining resources were applied. Specific topics include the Uruguay Round, the implications of economic integration in Europe, Canada-US regionalism, and national responses in Mexico, Costa Rica, Brazil, and India.

Having identified sustainability as an important goal, municipalities and other levels of government are turning to the issue of how to measure a community's progress towards achieving this goal. This report seeks to establish a methodology for developing sustainability indicators. It begins with a discussion of alternative definitions of urban sustainability and then describes some of the general characteristics of indicators and indices. Following a brief investigation of the meaning of sustainability indicators, several potential indicator frameworks are examined, including those which could be adapted from the work on state of the environment reporting, quality of life reporting, and healthy city reporting. Next, more detailed attention is given to appropriate criteria for identifying sustainability indicators and to the steps to be followed in applying those criteria. A number of examples of potential indicators are then described and evaluated against the criteria. Finally, detailed case studies of urban sustainability reporting are presented as well as a brief description of sustainability reporting projects in British Columbia.

Development charges are levies on developers to finance the off-site costs associated with development. Funds collected generally have to be used to pay for the infrastructure made necessary by the development. The purpose of this paper is to describe and evaluate the use of development charges in Canada. It provides a comprehensive review of provincial and territorial legislation regarding development charges as well as results of an extensive survey of Canadian municipalities. Issues examined in the survey include: the legislative basis for levying development charges; charge schedules and determinations of amounts; the types of services financed by these charges; the stages at which charges are levied and collected; and alternative means used to pay for or provide services. An analysis of the impact of development charges then suggests certain advantages and disadvantages of such charges.

Development of a human head simulator for studying the speech transmission qualities of protective masks and transducer systems : final report

By Hans Kunov and Daria Racansky. Downsview, ON : Dept. of National Defence, DCIEM, 1988. 155 p. : ill., Bibl.
MICROLOG 97-04845 (2 fiche)

There is a need for an accurate acousto-mechanical simulator of the human head which can reproduce the breath and voice patterns corresponding to different vocal efforts. Such a device can be used to evaluate speech transmission through respirators, flight helmets, and other masks, and in assessing speech communication devices in high-noise environments. This report describes the design and development of a human head simulator. It reviews anthropometric data on human heads and the means available to evaluate the appropriateness of manufactured head forms. It then describes the use of a computer aided design package to design and modify the head shape, the manufacture of an ellipsoid test structure and a head-like structure, and a set of experiments in which various impedance measurements were made, the fabrication of artificial skin and soft tissue, and design of a breath simulation pump. Respirators, their specifications and designs are reviewed, as are the findings of a literature review on breathing patterns in humans. Designs for voice simulation are also discussed.

Development of an acousto-optic correlator for the detection of LPI signals : final report Describes the design, construction, and testing of two preliminary acousto-optical correlators in preparation for development of a 500-megahertz signal-bandwidth acousto-optic correlator for use in detection of low probability of intercept (LPI) signals. Both preliminary designs have identical architectures. The first has a 20-megahertz signal bandwidth and was used to test the scaling laws that apply when a charge coupled device array is used to detect correlation envelope, and to measure the effect of Gaussian noise on the correlation envelope. The second has a 50-megahertz signal bandwidth and its testing had the objectives of becoming familiar with requirements for laser collimation optics and pre-detection optics. Two signal types were investigated with this processor: chirp and frequency-hopped signals.

Presents and analyzes water property and moored instrument data collected during a year-long study (1995-96) in Minette Bay, located at the head of Douglas Channel/Kitimat Arm about 150 kilometres inland from the coastal waters of Hecate Strait, British Columbia. The purpose of the study was to determine whether log handling in the bay significantly contributes to low dissolved oxygen concentrations in the waters of the bay. After some introductory historical information and background on the hydrology, tides, and winds of the area, the report describes the sampling program, methods, and instrumentation used. It then presents the observations and describes the renewal cycle of bay waters and the processes that drive the renewals. The subsequent section discusses the problem of oxygen update rates and their calculations and comparisons with other localities. Concludes with recom-

In this paper, we investigate the theoretical rationale for and implications of dividend taxation in a Canadian context. We focus in particular on the implications of dividend taxation for real investment. Three views of dividend taxation are described, each of which has different implications for investment and firm financial policy. Some of the literature which investigates the empirical relevance of these three views is reviewed. Accepting this as the relevant view, we perform some rough calculations of the impact of eliminating integration in Canada on the cost of capital, and speculate upon the possible investment effects of this hypothetical policy.

The analysis focuses on export markets and is based on average real export prices for forest products for the 1989-93 period. The model used in the study is a preliminary Statistics Canada Input-output model for 1990, which takes into account transportation of all intermediate products required for production but not transportation of end products. Forest products analyzed include newsprint, paper, lumber, shingles, and wood pulp.

This report appraises base and precious metal exploration in Chile under a set of base case conditions as profitable, in and of itself, and competitive with respect to Australia and Canada. The appraisals are based on estimates of the exploration expenditures, development costs, and production revenues and costs associated with an economic deposit, and a methodology that evaluates historical experience in the context of present-day economic and technological conditions. Sensitivities of the base case to variations in metal prices and minimum acceptable exploration target conditions and to the multi-billion-dollar discovery have been considered, as has the impact of taxation. The study database was compiled through the co-operation of a large number of domestic and international private mining companies and government agencies, and covers the 1970-92 period. For the purposes of time-trend analysis, the database is subdivided into the periods 1970-78, 1979-87, and 1988-92. The results provide a detailed picture of exploration economics in Chile as well as more general empirical evidence of the fundamental ingredients of successful mineral exploration.

This report shows how the ecosystem planning concept, traditionally used in rural or resource contexts, can be used to develop a planning framework for managing growth in urbanized regions. It first examines the meaning of ecosystem planning, particularly in comparison to the prevailing character of conventional planning practices. It then presents a representative survey of ecosystem planning across Canada and the eastern United States, identifying the main constraints and barriers encountered in applying the ecosystem planning approach. It then explores 11 other movements and methods that are in important ways similar to the ecosystem approach to planning and that may offer insights for the application of ecosystem planning in Canadian urban regions. These other approaches include bioregionalism, eco-cities, growth management, state of the environment reporting, conservation strategies, and the green cities concept. Finally, the report delineates how an ecosystem planning approach could be encouraged in Canada, either by adapting the approach to existing institutional conditions or by changing such conditions to incorporate ecosystem planning principles.

The Effects of taxation on U.S. multinationals and their Canadian affiliates

Develops an empirical approach that provides a general framework for studying the behaviour of multinational corporations, beginning with a dynamic structural model of the multinational firm. The model treats the multinational's factors of production in different countries as separate inputs into a general production technology and incorporates unobservable firm-specific productivity shocks and local demand shocks. A semi-parametric econometric procedure developed to estimate the model relies on the exit rule and input demand functions generated by the solution to the firm's stochastic dynamic decision problem to consistently estimate the parameters of the firm's production technology. The technology parameters are then estimated using a new firm-level panel data set on US multinationals and their Canadian affiliates. Three findings are suggested by the elasticity estimates, and are related to the wage gap between more- and less-skilled workers, the ease of substitution of US and Canadian fixed capital at the firm level, and the effects of business taxation on efficiency.

Analyzes the effects of taxes on the cost of capital, marginal effective tax rates, and gross rent flows for typical rental housing investments in Halifax, Nova Scotia. Utilizes two complementary theoretical frameworks: the theory of effective tax rates and the rental housing asset pricing model. The scope of the study encompasses all major elements of the Canadian tax regime, including federal and provincial income taxes, the federal Goods and Services Tax, provincial sales taxes, municipal property taxes, and impact fees. In addition to assessing the effects of the current tax regime, the study undertakes a number of simulations to assess the effects of changes in taxes and the general economic environment. It quantifies the various ways in which taxes affect effective tax rates, rents, and rates of return, and makes recommendations with respect to future research that would improve knowledge of the effects of taxes on rental markets.

The first describes best management practices and includes a review of current environmental management practices and of technologies used in British Columbia to recycle special wastes related to automobile recycling, as well as a list of licensed special waste transporters in the province. Best management practices are designed to provide recyclers with an economically feasible approach to managing special wastes. Physical and structural design requirements for the auto recycling facility are described, along with the proper procedures to manage special waste. The second document provides recyclers with a step-by-step procedure to conduct an environmental site assessment, check compliance with best management practices, and help develop a pollution prevention plan. The third document comprises a review of the auto recycling industry in British Columbia, the environmental regulations governing their operation, and a code of practice (including both facility design and operational requirements) for the industry to conduct an environmentally sound operation.

Épreuve des murs et fenêtres à écran pare-pluie : la méthode de stimulation de la cavité

Par Richard Quirouette. Ottawa : Société canadienne d'hypothèques et de logement, Division de l'innovation dans l'habitation, 1996. 38 p. : Ill. L'éd. anglaise (Testing rainscreen wall and window...): 97-04834/1. MICROLOG 97-04835 (1 fiche)

Ce rapport de recherche présente les résultats du deuxième volet à l'étude, soit l'élaboration d'un essai de conformité sur place des murs et des fenêtres à écran pare-pluie. Les objectifs visés portaient sur l'identification de l'ensemble des zones présentant des fuites d'air par opposition au fuites d'évent, aux fuites à l'emplacement des garnitures d'étanchéité des ouvrages compartimentalisés et au fuites depuis les pare-vent. Ce rapport portait aussi sur la signature de rendement de la réaction dynamique des écrans pare-pluie. Le concept fondamental a été élaboré dans ce laboratoire de construction de la Queen's University, en Ontario. Les résultats de l'exploration et de l'élaboration en laboratoire ont servi à formuler une méthode d'essai qui faisait le lien entre le rendement d'équilibrage des pressions prédites des écrans pare-pluie et les résultats d'essai de conformité sur place. C'est ainsi que cette méthode a pris le nom de Méthode de stimulation de la cavité.

Escaped farm salmon, environmental and ecological concerns

Natural Resources Consultants, Inc. Victoria : Environmental Assessment Office, 1997. x, 151 p. : Ill., Maps, Bibl. MICROLOG 97-04535 (2 fiche)

This paper examines the observed and potential consequences of escaped farm salmon in the British Columbia coastal regions in terms of genetic and/or ecological impacts on native salmon populations. It begins with an overview of the British Columbia salmon farming industry, including farm organization and operation, stock selection, and damage control. Reported escapes, factors causing escapes, and recoveries of farmed Atlantic salmon in the wild are also reviewed and discussed. It then evaluates the potential impacts of farmed salmon escapes on native salmon stocks, including genetic effects, hybridization, colonization, predation, and species competition, followed by an evaluation of the risk of these effects actually occurring. A separate section is devoted to escapes and their impacts in the Broughton Archipelago region, a major salmon-producing area. Finally, the paper assesses various approaches to prevention and mitigation of adverse effects of escaped farm salmon.

Evaluating test equipment for air tightness of construction details

By Kevin Knights. Ottawa : Canada Mortgage & Housing Corporation, 1995. 74 p. : Ill. MICROLOG 97-04831 (1 fiche)

Describes the development and testing of a device used for identifying leaks in air barrier systems during construction. The prototype developed is a one-piece, lightweight tool that is durable, easy to use, portable, and suitable for use on a construction site. The device includes a chamber which can be sealed satisfactorily to a variety of surfaces, and a vacuum pump that draws air into the chamber through any leaks, once the chamber has been sealed against the detail to be tested. A soap solution applied to the detail will bubble at locations of any leaks. The device was tested both in laboratory conditions and in the field, at a swimming pool building retrofit and at a health care facility and an apartment building under construction. Performance comparisons were made between the prototype and smoke trace testing. Tests were also conducted of the prototype's fan performance and of the prototype's pressure differential versus elapsed time.

Documents the results of the first phase of a project that evaluated three commercial mass-deacidification processes: diethyl zinc, MG-3 or Lithco, and Wei T'o technologies. The first phase tested these processes in deacidifying four naturally-aged papers of various dates (1728 to 1948). The relative permanence of papers treated by the three processes was evaluated by comparing data obtained before and after ageing. Data collected include the quantity and distribution of buffer reserve, as determined by scanning electron microscopy, atomic absorption, and titration; carbonyl content and degree of polymerization of cellulose; and physical condition (zero span tensile strength and colour), as well as the identification of problems specific to each treatment process.

By N. Enid Slack. Ottawa : Canada Mortgage & Housing Corporation, 1996. 75 p. : Bibl. French ed. (Le Financement des infrastructures...) : 97-04562/1. MICROLOG 97-04558 (1 fiche)

The purpose of this study is to evaluate the existing research on government infrastructure finance and to make recommendations on what research needs to be done and how it could be disseminated. Section I provides some background on the nature of infrastructure, including spending on infrastructure and trends in revenues. Section II outlines the criteria used to evaluate the financing techniques (taxes, special financing districts, fees and charges, public-private partnerships, and borrowing). The next five sections review the literature on each of those techniques. Section VIII reviews a consultation process in which individuals working in the area of infrastructure finance were asked to identify what information they require that is not currently available to them. Much of these expenditures are made by municipalities, & cover water services & sewage, transit, roads, & solid waste. The final sections present conclusions and recommendations.

By Cherry Kingsley. Victoria : Ministry for Children & Families, 1997. 67 p. : Bibl. ISBN 0-7726-3091-7 MICROLOG 97-04533 (1 fiche)

Reports on a project to obtain the views and inputs of marginalized youth about services to be developed for youth through the British Columbia Child,

Family & Community Service Act. The project was guided by the experiences of those youth, more specifically a reference group of street youth, sexually exploited youth, young parents, youth in care, youth receiving income assistance, and Aboriginal youth. Recommendations are made which arose from meetings of the reference group and which relate to youth empowerment and involvement in the systems that affect them. The project also involved consultations with youth in care, Aboriginal youth, and street youth in nine British Columbia communities. The youth were asked about issues relating to achieving independence, rights of youth, and access to services. These consultations also produced recommendations which are presented in this report.

Fire ground staffing and delivery systems within a comprehensive fire safety effectiveness model

Toronto : Office of the Fire Marshal of Ontario, 1993. ix, 49 p. : Ill. MICROLOG 97-04407 (1 fiche)

The Ontario Office of the Fire Marshal has initiated a long-term research project that will lead to a comprehensive fire safety effectiveness model which is intended to serve as a basis for an objective evaluation of fire protection services in a municipality. The purpose of this paper is to state the preliminary position of the Office regarding the number of fire fighters required at the scene of a house fire within the context of the comprehensive model. The paper also addresses alternative ways in which a fire department may deliver fire fighters and vehicles to the emergency scene, while taking into account that delivery systems may vary for different fire departments. A validation process for evaluating the model under various fire scenarios is also presented. Includes glossary.

Presents findings of the Terra Nova National Park fire history study, along with an attempt to describe the park's fire regime and the impact of that regime on park vegetation. Study methods included field sampling of plots located in a random manner designed to fill in gaps between age data previously collected in the park. Areas sampled were predominantly black spruce cover types. Site attribute data collected within each plot included crown closure, percent cover, total tree height, tree diameter at breast height, percent mortality, and age of dominant tree species. Field data analysis focused on forest age. In addition, historical fire records were searched and information on past fire occurrence, size, cause, and dates were used to estimate the fire regime for the area. Factors contributing to fire are discussed, including the relationship between fire occurrence and meteorological conditions.

The barge Irving Whale, originally carrying 4,200 long tons of fuel oil, sank in the Gulf of St. Lawrence on September 7, 1970. A 1994 environmental assessment favoured the recovery of the barge with its cargo on board, in order to eliminate the possibility of leaks or spills from this vessel into the marine environment. In 1995, it was found that the barge originally contained 9.4 tonnes of Therminol FR-1 heating fluid in its cargo heating system. This fluid contains 80% polychlorinated biphenyls (PCB) and 20% chlorinated benzene. This finding prompted a supplementary environmental assessment which is presented in this report. Sections of the assessment report cover the characteristics of the barge and its heating system, its condition on the bottom of the Gulf, details of the proposed salvage method, evaluation of alternative options and their risks, salvage project management, the existing biophysical environment at the barge site, the impact assessment methodology, and the results of the biophysical and socio-economic impact assessment of the salvage operation, including effects of worst-case spill scenarios. Mitigation and monitoring proposals are also provided. Appendices include detailed independent reports on the presence of PCB aboard the barge, the structural strength of the barge and its ability to withstand a lifting operation, the impacts of various hypothetical spill scenarios, and the potential socio-economic and market impacts of those scenarios.

The purpose of this document is to act as the introduction and foundation of a series of licensing guides that could assist a reviewer when reviewing safety analyses submitted to the Atomic Energy Control Board. It is based on a pilot study that explored the feasibility of such a guide for a large loss-of-coolant accident. The document develops a set of criteria to be met by the safety analysis submitted by a licensee. The criteria are developed in a hierarchical, top-down structure. Guidelines are provided both for what should be documented in demonstrating compliance with the requirements for event frequency and consequence, and for elements of the process by which the analysis should be carried out and documented. A presentation format that can be used for accident-specific safety analysis review guides is described and used in the balance of the report as an example. Each criterion is supported by an analysis objective, a list of key parameters, a mathematically stated success condition, a list of key analysis tasks, an indication of the variables that affect the key parameters, a diagram indicating the interaction of analytical disciplines, and a set of review guidelines.

Greening government international : plan for a comprehensive program to develop and test greening government operations as a means of promoting Canadian technology outreach and environmental industries

Prepared by the Bayswater Consulting Group, Inc. ; for Technology Transfer Office, Technology Development Directorate...et al., Environment Canada. Hull, PQ : The Dept., 1995. 31 p. MICROLOG 97-04516 (1 fiche)

In April 1995, the Canadian government approved a government-wide approach to apply sound environmental management principles to its own everyday operations. It therefore appears that Canada has a major opportunity to use greening of government operations as a method of promoting both useful technology transfer from government to government and also to increase foreign markets for Canadian environmental technologies using this framework. This document presents a proposal for a 'Greening Government International' program that would include such deliverables as: a standard environmental management package for governments; exchange visits of experts in greening government operations; workshops in the host country; joint research projects; and exchanges of technical information. The document outlines anticipated risks and challenges of such a program, a proposed sequence of steps for program development, an anticipated approach for use by Canadian teams visiting host countries, and potential benefits of the program. The appendix contains proposals for specific program packages, including budgets, tasks, and anticipated results.

Assumptions were arrived at using the breeding stock, management practices, and facilities commonly employed on this size of an enterprise, and productivity and performance assumptions are based on data from national and provincial herd recording programs as well as data collected from numerous herds by feed companies and other organizations. Data are presented for farrow-finish, weaner, and grower-finish pig production.

Human factors issues in the Pickering A risk assessment, PARA

By David Embrey and James Reason. Ottawa : Atomic Energy Control Board, 1996. 50 p. : ill., Bibl. Cover title: Human factors issues in the PARA.
MICROLOG 97-04920 (1 fiche)

Summarizes work performed in connection with the human factors issues project in the Pickering A Risk Assessment (PARA). After an overview, sections 2 to 6 focus on the project's first objective: development of a new screening approach for use in human reliability assessment. These sections include an overview of the currently-used screening approach, evidence from the literature on the types of human interaction that have the most significant impact on risk in nuclear power plant operations, analysis of the underlying mechanisms of failures in these tasks, and proposals for screening criteria. Section 8 concerns the provision of support for engineering analysts to assist them in identifying types of human failures which could have severe consequences. The final sections describe a possible approach to the assessment of risk arising from human errors which would not be dependent on the availability of a large database of error probabilities. The approach is combined with an existing methodology called the influence diagram to allow the effects of utility and regulatory policies on the factors directly influencing errors to be evaluated.

Image classification by neural networks using moment invariant feature vectors

By Kenneth L. Sala. Ottawa : Industry Canada, Communications Research Centre, 1997. xl, 253 p. : ill., Bibl. (CRC report / Communications Research Centre (Canada) ; no. 97-002)
MICROLOG 97-04896 (3 fiche)

Describes an image classification system based on the extraction of moment invariant feature vectors and an artificial neural network classifier. The vectors are derived from the test images using series of orthogonal basis functions. The images used in the study possess random scales, lateral positions, and angles of orientation in the image plane. In addition, random noise with different signal to noise ratios (SNRs) is superimposed on the images. The feature vector extraction technique employs the concept of moment invariants so that the feature vector components are independent of the image's scale, lateral position, and orientation. The neural network employed for the classification task is a multilayer perceptron network trained with the backpropagation algorithm. The performance of the overall classification system is determined by measuring the classification accuracy as a function of the SNR of the test imagery. The work and results presented form the basis for a neural-network-based image recognition system for use in classifying military synthetic aperture radar imagery of land targets.

This study is written from the perspective of the cities and towns of Canada affected by Aboriginal land claims and self-government. It presents three case studies illustrating the different ways in which land claims can affect an urban centre and also illustrating different modes of Aboriginal self-government: Saskatoon, where a stand-alone urban reserve was created; Temagami, Ontario, where shared stewardship or co-management was proposed to give both Aboriginal and other residents a say in the use and management of Crown land; and Inuvik, where the local First Nation wants to negotiate a regional government for the region where Aboriginal people make up the majority. The study includes a description of the federal Additions to Reserve Policy which applies to all urban centres, and lists those cities, towns, and villages which have long-term existing relationships with First Nations. It also reviews the provincial tax treatment of non-reserve, Aboriginal-owned urban land. The study ends with a summary of urban issues and concerns about Aboriginal land claims and self-government, and some suggested solutions.

Impact of loss of redundancy on availability, Darlington post accident water cooling system (PAWCS) study

By James E. Smith. Ottawa : Atomic Energy Control Board, 1995. ii, 100 p. : ill.
MICROLOG 97-04919 (2 fiche)

The post accident water cooling system at the Darlington nuclear power plant is a relatively simple system with two redundant trains. This paper describes and presents results from a study conducted to: determine the effect on the system availability of the unavailability of one of the redundant trains; and determine the effect on system availability of delays to the repair of the components of a failed train, within specified limits, or changes in the test intervals for the available train. The analysis used a simplified fault tree extracted from the fault tree basis model in the Darlington Probabilistic Safety Evaluation. The fault tree was analyzed initially with the same component reliability as used for the basis model to establish a base case for comparison. The fault tree was then re-analyzed several times with different data to determine the effects of varying delay times to repairs and varying test intervals.

The assumptions inherent in the accepted methods for calculating availability and unavailability are discussed along with their implications, and situations where the basic assumptions may not apply are noted. Issues of concern discussed in the report include:

the concept of time-averaged versus instantaneous unavailability; the effect of test interval time on time-averaged unavailability; the effect of repair time limits on calculated unavailability; staggered versus coincident testing of redundant components; the practicability of specifying repair times for redundant components; the effects of mission-related failures; and demand-based probabilities of failure.

Since 1987, increasing numbers of gulls have nested next to a colony of common terns (Sterna hirundo) on Tern Island in Kouchibouguac National Park. This document describes a study conducted to estimate the risk of predation imposed on tern eggs and chicks by the presence of these gulls. The field studies compared the vigilance behaviour of terns nesting at the periphery of their colony to that of terns nesting in the centre of it, examining the hypothesis that vigilance would be greater at the periphery. Circular enclosures installed around groups of tern nests that contained eggs blocked the escape of tern chicks and allowed monitoring of hatching success, fledging success, and chick disappearance. Predation attempts by gulls outside of the enclosures were observed from a portable blind. All observations of vigilance behaviour took place at the egg stage and from a permanent blind.

This paper outlines a general framework for implementing monetary policy in a regime with zero reserve requirements, focusing on the case of Canada and on the link between two concepts: the instruments to control the supply and cost of settlement balances, and the level of interest rates in the interbank money market. The paper first describes some general principles that apply to systems with zero reserve requirements, then describes the framework of rules, incentives, and practices that will apply in Canada after the installation of the electronic payments system (the Large-Value Transfer System) in 1997. It then describes the operations used to neutralize unwanted effects on the supply of settlement balances that arise from government transactions, and discusses the nature of the equilibrium position in the market for overnight funds. Finally, it evaluates the appropriateness of the very short-term interest rate versus the monetary base as the proximate target for monetary policy implementation.

This analysis is directed at industrial mechanics or millwrights who tend to specialize in the post-installation, maintenance, and repair of machinery and equipment, and are employed in industrial establishments. The analysis identifies tasks and sub-tasks performed by a millwright, arranged in blocks of distinct operations relevant to that occupation. These blocks include workplace safety, work planning, selecting and processing metals, machining parts and components, cutting and assembling metal components, installing and removing equipment and systems, maintenance and repair, and fabrication and modification of equipment. For each task, the document outlines the element of skill and knowledge needed to perform the task adequately, identifies any shifts or changes in technology that affect the task, lists tools and equipment required for the task, and provides an indication of whether the task has been validated by each province and territory. The appendix includes a list of tools and equipment used in the occupation, and a tabulation of the percentage of time a worker spends performing each block and task in a given year (by province/territory and for Canada as a whole).

Parameters analyzed during the program included nutrients, faecal coliforms, dissolved oxygen, temperature, pH, non-filterable residues, organic carbon, and aquatic productivity indicators. Correlation analyses of relationships between various parameters was used to indicate the possible impacts of agricultural operations on water quality.

Alternative development standards would encourage development patterns which are more affordable, discourage sprawl, are environmentally responsive, support transit, reduce automobile dependency, and create more liveable communities. This report considers development standards at two scales: local and regional, with a focus on the latter. It begins with discussion of why alternate standards are needed and a literature review of the current state of development standards and related initiatives. It then presents case studies of four urban centres chosen to explore existing development standards, explore the relationship to urban form, and assess the current status of regional and local development standards in North America. Finally, it illustrates a new approach to applying development standards, using a fictitious community that portrays a fabric of rural concession roads, natural water features, and an existing village. Before and after plans illustrate the evolution of this community, planned according to an integrated approach.

An integrated model of Quebec-Ontario-U.S. northeast softwood lumber markets

This paper focuses on the segment of the North American lumber market pertaining to trade in spruce, pine, and fir lumber products between Quebec, Ontario, and the US north-east. A model is specified which encompasses the demand, supply, and trade of kiln- and air-dried softwood lumber in those three markets. The model also incorporates relevant policy variables such as the exchange rate, export tax, and the Canadian federal sales tax. Explicit use is made of some salient characteristics of competitive markets, specifically the law of one price and profit maximizing behaviour by producers. The supply side is derived from the symmetric normalized quadratic profit function as suggested by Kohli (1993). The paper relies mostly on elasticities to represent the information about the structural features of the three markets. Results are compared with the perceived view of how well-functioning markets operate.

This report seeks to describe the issues, concerns, and implications of the problem created by the tension between municipal planning and environmental control, and to provide a situational analysis that includes a look at alternative future scenarios and examination of prospects for improvement. Research methodology included surveys of public officials and environmental consultants, a literature review of environmental assessment, interviews with public officials, and a review of initiatives in municipal environmental assessment and planning. Challenges and opportunities for change are identified and discussed, including the concepts of sustainable development, ecological planning and design, and the Environmental Management System.

Describes a project designed to bring together several new techniques for improving the information needed to implement a decision support system for deer yards. The system will be used to predict the consequences of timber management activities on the supply of deer habitat and the subsequent population responses, and to identify the most profitable locations for yard management activities such as browse plot creation and emergency feeding. This report focuses on the combined role that satellite remote sensing, large-scale sampling photos, and geographic information systems (GIS) can play in supplying needed deer-yard habitat information. The data sources were brought together on a GIS platform according to an optimized design. Several habitat supply models were developed and tested which resulted in models that located and quantified suitable conifer cover for browsing and thermal protection in winter. The models were applied to a deer yard near North Bay. The appendix includes description of the image data classification procedures used.

Ce document analyse les distorsions que peut créer l'interaction des impôts fédéraux et provinciaux sur les entreprises, et indique comment ces distorsions, qui influent sur la nature et le taux des prélèvements fiscaux, peuvent être réduites ou même éliminées. Une distorsion survient quand un ordre de gouvernement ne tient pas entièrement compte de l'effet de ses choix fiscaux sur le budget d'un autre ordre de gouvernement. Les choix des gouvernements, en matière de taux et de nature des impôts prélevés, risquent alors d'être sous-optimaux pour l'ensemble de la nation. Nous examinons cinq principales sources de distorsions dans le régime fiscal canadien : (i) l'occupation conjointe, par les gouvernements fédéral et provinciaux, du champ de l'impôt des sociétés, (ii) les impôts prélevés par un ordre de gouvernement qui donnent droit à un crédit ou à une déduction à un autre pailier, (iii) la prise en compte des impôts sur les ressources naturelles d'un autre ordre de gouvernement, (iv) le traitement es incitatifs fiscaux accordés par un autre ordre de gouvernement et (v) le régime fiscal des sociétés d'État.

This paper provides an analysis of the ways in which the interaction between federal and provincial taxes on businesses can create distortions in the levels and types of taxation and identifies ways in which these distortions can be minimized or even eliminated. Distortions arise when full account is not taken of the effects of one level of government's tax policy choices on the other level's budget. Where this is the case, government choices of both the levels and types of taxation are likely to be sub-optimal relative to a national optimum. We identify and examine five key sources of such distortions in the Canadian tax system. These are: (i) federal and provincial co-occupation of the corporate income tax field, (ii) taxes levied at one level of government that are creditable/deductible for the purpose of calculating taxable income at another level, (iii) treatment of one level of government's resource taxes under the tax system of the other level of government, (iv) treatment of one level of government's tax incentives under the tax system of the other level of government, and (v) tax treatment of Crown corporations.

Examines the effects of recent tax law changes in the United States and the potential for fundamental tax reform to alter the incentives facing businesses in their real and financial behaviour. First provides an overview of the US tax system, then reviews the changes enacted as part of the 1986 Tax Reform Act affecting business taxation at both the domestic and international level. Notes effects of these changes on locational choices for real investment, the reported location of profits resulting from the use of transfer prices, and the financial choices of multinational corporations in their use of debt. Three different proposed reforms of the US tax system that would replace the income tax with a tax based on consumption are considered, along with their potential effect on location decisions of multinational corporations and on transfer pricing.

This note points out features of the folds and cleavages in the Yellowknife domain that, regardless of origin, cannot be simply attributed to two phases of regional deformation. The regional geometry and structural history are considered with particular reference to structures in the Ross Lake area. A deformational scheme is presented that explains both the small-scale and larger features.

The first chapter reviews the prevalence of male victimization, including sexual abuse and harassment, physical abuse and neglect, corporal punishment, community- and institution-based violence, suicide, the professional response to male victims, and media images of violence toward boys and young men. Chapter 2 reviews literature on the perpetrators of male victimization, whatever their age and gender, and their characteristics. The final chapters review the effects of victimization on males and the implications of the publication's findings for research, assessment, treatment, and program development.

Lagging productivity growth in the service sector : mismeasurement, mismanagement or misinformation?

By Dinah Maclean. Ottawa : Bank of Canada, 1997. 39 p. : Ill., Bibl. (Working paper / Bank of Canada ; 97-6 ISSN 1192-5434) ISBN 0-662-25568-2 MICROLOG 97-04305 (1 fiche)

Analyzes concerns about lagging productivity growth in the service sector undermining Canada's standard of living. First considers the size of the disparity in productivity growth between the service sector and the goods sector, how this disparity has changed over time, and whether a lower than average productivity growth is widespread across the service sector or confined to specific service industries. This is followed by discussion of the main reasons put forward to explain lagging service-sector productivity growth: measurement difficulties; issues associated with investment in new technology; the lower level of competition in the service sector; and the extent to which services can be categorized as incapable of high productivity growth. The final section draws some implications for the future growth of total output.

The Land use implications of alternative municipal financial tools : a discussion paper - 2d ed.

The first section of this paper presents a model of local government finance based on the benefits received from local government services. It includes discussion of the role of local government and the appropriate financing tools to carry out this role. The second section reviews the sources of revenues used by municipal governments, outlines recent trends in the use of these revenues, and evaluates the extent to which these trends have been consistent with the benefit model of local finance. The third section reviews planning tools used by municipal governments, highlights recent trends in planning, and discusses the relationship between planning and municipal finance. The fourth section analyzes the impact on land use decisions of three sources of revenue currently used by Canadian municipalities: user fees, property taxes, and development charges. The fifth section considers the potential impact of two sources not currently used: site value taxes and land value capture taxes. The sixth section summarizes the findings and discusses the implications of using tax policy to achieve land use objectives.

This document is the prototype for a proposed set of review guides that will eventually address all nuclear power plant accidents. The purpose of the guides is to assist in and standardize the review of analyses that have been submitted in support of an application for the operation of a nuclear power plant. This document develops a set of lower-tier criteria to be met by the analysis for a large LOCA (loss-of-coolant accident) submitted by a licensee. The criteria are developed in a hierarchical, top-down structure. Each criterion is supported by an analysis objective, a list of key parameters, a mathematically stated success condition, a list of key analysis tasks, an indication of the variables that significantly affect the key parameters, a diagram indicating the interaction of analytical disciplines, and a set of review guidelines.

This report is primarily based on extensive collections of fossils made during the 1950s and 1960s and from virtually continuous core drilled from a well on the Manitoba coast. It reviews the Ordovician biostratigraphy and paleoecology of the Hudson Bay lowlands and provides detailed descriptions of brachiopods found in two assemblage zones within the Upper Ordovician rocks. The brachiopod species comprise 15 genera and 27 species of orthids, strophomenids, rhynchonellids, and atrypids, including one new species (Tetraphalerella churchillensis, an unusually large and flat strophomenid). Correlations to equivalent rock units in other sedimentary basins are also discussed.

Presents a biography, first published in 1948, of Emil Julius Mellicke, who emigrated to the United States in 1866 and settled in Minnesota. He became a prosperous farmer and was elected to the Minnesota House of Representatives and the State Senate. After visiting a Canadian agricultural exhibit, he decided to visit the Canadian plains and subsequently purchased land near Dundurn, Saskatchewan. His success at farming was instrumental in attracting many other settlers to the region under the leadership of the founders of the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company. His story of pioneer life indicates the crucial role played by American farmers and businessmen in the settlement and development of the Canadian plains.

After a brief historical overview of forest fire management in Ontario, this paper discusses several potentially useful levels of protection measures. It describes a hypothetical forest which is used to illustrate how very simple fire management subsystems can interact to produce complex system behaviour that is sometimes difficult to understand and manage. An overview of the basic principles of fire economics, planning under uncertainty, and traditional approaches to level-of-protection planning provides an analytical foundation for fire management planning. An integrated fire/forest management framework that can be enhanced and used for level-of-protection planning in Ontario is then presented. Finally, several important issues that should be addressed when assessing Ontario's level of fire protection needs are briefly discussed.

À cette fin, on doit résoudre un système d'équations non linéaires, ce qui nécessite des temps de calcul élevés. Dans le cadre de cette étude, la problématique porte sur la localisation d'un dipôle en temps réel.

The study reported in this document, designed to identify ecotourism opportunities desired by visitors and potential visitors to northern Ontario, was conducted using two surveys. The first focused on summer travellers, visitors to the area, and residents. The second survey (a mail survey) focused on people with an interest in outdoor recreation as indicated by their membership in recreational organizations. Principal components analysis was used to identify different market segments among respondents. The objective of this segmentation was to divide a relatively heterogeneous group of actual and potential ecotourists into more homogeneous groups having similar product and service needs. Segments were identified that show potential demand for ecotourism in northern Ontario, thereby allowing operators and marketers in the tourism industry to identify specific target markets and develop product and service packages that best suit each segment.

Begins with a review of pressures to modify Canadian cultural policies in four main areas: increasingly free global trade and investment; technological advances; budget constraints; and Canada's position in the international cultural marketplace. This is followed by discussion of the reasons generally advanced for public intervention in the cultural field, with a view to identifying the ones most relevant in the contemporary Canadian context. Key instruments of cultural policy are critically assessed: Canadian-content regulations, investment and ownership restrictions, and subsidies and tax policies. Cases are identified where these policies may have outlived their usefulness and other where current policies could be strengthened or made more effective. Finally, implications of proposed policy changes on specific cultural industries (publishing, film/television, broadcasting, recording, the information highway) are evaluated.

Monetary shocks in the G-6 countries : is there a puzzle?

By Ben S. Fung and Marcel Kasumovich. Ottawa : Bank of Canada, 1997. 20 p. : Ill., Bibl. (Working paper / Bank of Canada ; 97-7 ISSN 1192-5434) ISBN 0-662-25645-X
MICROLOG 97-04879 (1 fiche)

One of the primary issues of econometric models that attempt to resolve the uncertainty about the dynamics of the monetary transmission mechanism is the identification of monetary policy shocks. Vector autoregression (VAR) approaches that use over-identifying restrictions have shown success in isolating such shocks. This paper examines monetary shocks identified by long-run cointegration restrictions and the assumption of long-run money neutrality in exactly identified VAR models across six industrialized countries. Simple cointegrated VAR models for each country consisting of a conventional monetary aggregate, a price level, output and short-term interest are estimated. Parameters for a single cointegration vector are estimated for each country and the vector is interpreted as a long-run demand-for-money function. Impulse-response functions for the monetary shocks are then presented and the paper examines the speed at which the models reach equilibrium. The results suggest a role for the stock of money in the transmission mechanism.

The objectives of this study were: to record the experiences of jurisdictions where municipal consolidations were undertaken; to chronicle alternative actions designed to achieve efficiencies of larger service areas while maintaining the uniqueness and autonomy of individual communities; and to examine the role of the province as facilitator as well as law maker in municipal consolidation. Study methodology included consultations and interviews with informed provincial and municipal officials and academics, examination of government documents, and questionnaire surveys. Consolidation is used in this study as a term that includes amalgamation, annexation, and the creation of regional governments. The study report reviews the context for consolidation decisions, including the problems that are thought to be addressed by consolidation. It then presents case studies of consolidations across Canada from the village to the regional level. Finally, options for consolidation are assessed, Including non-consolidation approaches, and financial considerations are discussed.

Paper provides data & analysis on rate structures & levels in use. It presents data on the structure of water rates & the resultant retail prices for water servicing across Canada. These data provide municipal officials, rate makers, & other policy makers with much of the data needed to assess the effectiveness of current pricing arrangements & the burden that water bills impose on the average water user. Sections outline methodology used & limitations of the analysis then describe major characteristics of water pricing rate schedules & include several price calculations. That section emphasizes the types of rate schedules in use (flat rates, volume-based rates, sewer charges, frequency of rate schedule usage, average & marginal residential water prices, unit price comparisons), monthly total price for typical consumers, & price per cubic metre for residential & commercial water users. Section 3 estimates requirements for capital plus operating & maintenance to assure adequate levels of water servicing. Finally, the paper offers conclusions & implications for public policy.

Ontario charity gaming club project

Coopers & Lybrand (Firm). Toronto : The Company, 1996. 40 p. At head of title: Gaming Control Commission, Province of Ontario. MICROLOG 97-04462 (1 fiche)

The Ontario government is committed to the further development of the charity gaming industry in the province by replacing the roving location format that currently exists with a more strategic plan to license up to 50 permanent charity gaming clubs. This report examines the market for, potential financial implications of, and site location possibilities of charity gaming clubs in Ontario. It first reviews the existing and planned casino gaming developments in Ontario and neighbouring jurisdictions, then estimates the market visitation and win potential for charity gaming clubs. The methodology used involved delineation of the province into geographic market areas, estimation of potential visitation and win based on estimated gaming propensity factors, and determination of total supportable number of clubs based on average win per day levels. Recommendations are presented for initial location of clubs in each market area, taking into account existing and planned commercial casino gambling operations. Appendices contain detailed analytical tables and supporting documentation.

The Ontario regulation and policy-making process in a comparative context, exploring the possibilities for reform : a report

Toronto : Environmental Commissioner of Ontario, 1996. viii, 84 p. : Bibl. MICROLOG 97-04875 (1 fiche)

This paper examines the impact of the Ontario Environmental Bill of Rights on the process by which regulations, policies, and guidelines are made in Ontario. It first discusses the factors driving social deregulation and specific concerns with the regulatory process in Canada. It then examines the pre-Bill of Rights regulation and policy-making process in Ontario prior to taking on the main theme stated above. It also compares the existing and emerging situation in Ontario with the approaches of the Canadian federal government, other Canadian provinces and territories, and the United States federal government. On the basis of this analysis, potential means are identified by which the effectiveness, efficiency, fairness, and accountability of the Ontario regulation and policy-making process can be further improved.

The majority of North American Atlantic puffins (Fratrula arctica) breeds on three island colonies within the Witless Bay Seabird Ecological Reserve off the south-east coast of Newfoundland. Because of the importance of those island colonies and the uncertainty of previous population estimates, it was decided to re-survey the colony at Great Island, site of the largest colony, as part of a larger study of the breeding ecology of the puffins on the island. Three component measurements were used in calculation of breeding populations: burrow density, burrow occupancy, and colony area. Sampling was done using a series of marked parallel transects. Population estimates are presented and compared with those of earlier surveys. Incidental information on other seabirds and mammals observed on the island in 1992-94 is also provided.

Population distribution and the management of urban growth in six selected urban regions in Canada : a report

The general objectives of this study were: to develop a quantitative picture of the changing population distribution in six selected urban regions (Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary, and Vancouver); to identify the principal infrastructure and land use planning issues associated with the changing population patterns in those regions, based on the perceptions and experiences of senior planning professionals; and to identify the policies and strategies developed by regional and municipal governments, and to ascertain perceptions of their success. The report first describes overall patterns of urban growth and interprets the patterns based on a conceptual model of the evolution of an urban-centred region. It then turns attention to the six urban regions, discussing governmental structure, patterns of change, perceptions of issues, and strategies, with discussion centred around a core (usually urban core and suburbs combined) and rural-urban fringe differentiation. Issues and strategies are then synthesized and conclusions are presented concerning critical components for tackling the management of municipalities in the context of changing urban regions.

Le Canada, tout comme les autres pays, peut imposer les sociétés : 1) parce que c'est souhaitable; 2) parce que c'est nécessaire pour atteindre certains objectifs; 3) parce que c'est commode (ces réponses peuvent bien sûr être complémentaires). Ces trois motifs généraux, le caractère souhaitable, la nécessité et la commodité, sont étudiés dans les trois premières parties de ce document, bien que la ligne de démarcation entre eux ne soit pas toujours clairement définie. Dans la cinquième partie, nous voyons brièvement comment, une fois ces motifs pris en compte, les sociétés devraient être imposées; la dernière partie porte sur quelques autres facteurs qui semblent pertinents dans le cadre d'une analyse visant à déterminer les changements à apporter à la structure d'imposition des sociétés et au taux à appliquer.

This report proposes a legal response to the problem of domestic abuse in Alberta, with two primary goals: to make it easier to obtain and enforce orders to protect persons from domestic abuse, and to make orders more effective by providing remedies to secure the claimant's protection. The first two sections consider the title of a proposed Protection Against Domestic Abuse Act and whether it should have a preamble that creates a context for the legislation. The next section discusses the question of jurisdiction over protection orders and over the review and appeal of orders, including routine and emergency orders. This is followed by consideration of what types of abusive conduct can ground an order, who is entitled to protection under the Act, who can bring an application for an order, and the types of remedies available under the order (including prohibition of contact, financial provision, removal of respondent from the residence, contact with children, possession of property, and counselling). Final sections cover matters such as enforcement, duration of orders, false or malicious applications, and administrative issues. The appendix includes the text of the proposed Act.

A cette fin, le Comité permanent des finances a formé le Sous-comité de l'examen de la LMSI, et le Comité permanent des affaires étrangères et du commerce international a demandé à son Sous-comité sur les différends commerciaux de travailler de concert avec le Sous-comité de l'examen de la LMSI à cette tâche. Ce document présente le rapport sur la Loi sur les mesures spéciales d'importation. La LMSI régit l'application de droits antidumping ou compensateurs aux importations de marchandises sous-évaluées ou subventionnées qui portent préjudice aux producteurs nationaux.

Nous utiliserons trois concepts pour nous aider dans cette tâche, soient ceux de rareté, d'avantage comparatif et de compétitivité. L'élargissement du débat s'avérera nécessaire pour tenir compte de l'usage multiple de la forêt. Une analyse statistique exploratoire des prix du bois rond livré aux usines canadiennes sera réalisée. Partant du constat que l'imperfection des marchés peut influencer de multiples façons notre problématique, nous présenterons pour finir un survol de la situation réelle ou potentielle du secteur forestier canadien à cet égard.

This document is one of a series of studies of foreign jurisdictions undertaken to put Canadian federal public service renewal into the broader context of reforms under way internationally, given that much can be learned from the ideas and experiences of others who face similar challenges. The document presents an outline of the public service reform program of the successive Labour governments that held office in Australia from 1983 to early 1996. It begins with background on the Australian government and the public service reforms that began in the 1970s. It then reviews the human resource dimension of the public service reforms; the budgetary, financial management, and related reforms; the structural reforms; and 1990s evaluations of the reforms. Appendices include a list of principles for the provision of services to government agencies.

Regional cleavages and tectonics of the Archean Slave Province

Following a long period of episodic igneous activity and clastic sedimentation, volcanic rocks, syenitic plutons and greywacke-mudstones of the Slave Province were regionally deformed, metamorphosed, and intruded by voluminous granitic plutons. In order to identify regional structural arrangements of crustal-scale import, this paper examines the distribution, temporal relationships, and trends of cleavages observed in the Province, particularly late-stage cleavages widespread in extensive metagreywacke-mudstones and that are minimally affected by later deformation or the influence of later plutons. Topics discussed include folding, bedding foliation, early and main cleavages, trends in cleavages in northern and southern domains, cleavage relationships, and possible scenarios of cleavage development.

Regional socio-economic assessment of the Nisga'a Agreement in Principle

Victoria : The Province, 1996. xvii, 87 p. : ill., Bbl. MICROLOG 97-04524 (2 fiche)

In March 1996, the British Columbia, federal, and Nisga'a governments signed the Nisga'a Treaty Negotiations Agreement in Principle (AIP), which provides the basis for negotiating the final Nisga'a treaty agreement and implementation plan. This report examines the possible effects of a treaty based on the AIP for the province's north-west portion. The analysis is based on reasonable scenarios and numerical estimates of economic impacts are limited to direct impacts. Four types of economic effects are identified: new economic activity, transfers of activity due to transfer of natural resources, reductions of activity due to changes in industry sectors, and other effects such as changes to provincial government revenues or expenditures. Two main types of social impacts are also identified: changes to quality of life in communities and effects on supply and service businesses; and stress and difficulties experienced by individuals whose jobs may be lost or income reduced due to transfer or reduction of economic activity. Effects are evaluated for the following sectors: forestry, fishing, mining, mushroom harvesting, and tourism; and also with regard to financial transfers, fiscal arrangements, and taxation.

Remote determination of cloud temperature and transmittance from spectral radiance measurements : method and results

Proposes a method for the evaluation of cloud temperature and transmittance from ground-level measurements of the downwelling spectral radiance. The method uses the strong emission band of ozone at 9.6 microns, which constitutes a natural source of infrared radiation for probing clouds. Temperature and transmittance are derived from the cloudy sky radiance measured in two narrow spectral channels: the first approximately at the centre of the ozone band at 9.48 microns and the second off the band at 9.15 microns. The cloud parameters are found by solving a system of equations requiring, as input, an estimate of the cloud height and thickness obtained from lidar returns, and of atmospheric temperature and humidity profiles. Validation tests performed on experimental spectra are described which demonstrate the accuracy of the method. Main sources of method limitation are also identified and analyzed.

In addition, the issues of spatial resolution are discussed, particularly with respect to the relationship between surface features (objects and phenomena that contribute to spectral reflectance) and spatial resolution, and how this relationship affects classification accuracy.

Certaines parties du programme ont été initiées au cours du Plan d'action Saint-Laurent. La superficie du territoire à couvrir ainsi que le peu de temps pour répondre aux objectifs du plan SLV 2000 nécessitent un outil qui allie efficacité et précision tout en facilitant la prise de décision. A cause de son approche synoptique, la télédétection contribue en partie à la réalisation de ces objectifs. Ce document contient l'ensemble des données de télédétection acquises par la section Gestion et diffusion de l'information, qui datent de 1973 à 1994. Ces données comprennent les images spatiales et aéroportées, les mesures d'éclairement solaire enregistrées lors des survols ainsi que les mesures de la qualité de l'eau prises simultanément aux différents survols. La figure 1 montre les jeux d'images LANDSAT utilisées dans certains projets pour la cartographie de thèmes spécifiques à une petite échelle cartographique. Ces images sont regroupées au chapitre 2. La figure 2 résume tous les survols effectués avec un capteur aéroporté. Chacun de ces survols est décrit dans le chapitre 3. Les mesures au sol ont été effectuées à contrat par des consultants. Ce document décrit la méthodologie utilisée pour traiter les données ainsi qu'une synthèse des résultats finaux pouvant être utilisés dans d'autres études.

Ce document porte sur un projet de télédétection qui a permis de calculer la superficie occupée par les macrophytes submergés et d'estimer la biomasse totale des macrophytes du lac Saint-Pierre. Les résultats du projet combinés au dosage des contaminants contenus dans ces macrophytes ont servi à évaluer la quantité totale de contaminants contenue dans la végétation submergée du lac Saint-Pierre. La méthodologie employée pour cartographier la densité des macrophytes est basée sur une analyse de corrélation et de régression. Une approche logarithmique a servi à définir le modèle. Les images de télédétection ont été employées pour dresser des cartes de la répartition des macrophytes par classes de biomasse. Le modèle utilisé a permis d'estimer une perte moyenne de biomasse de 77,5 p. 100 entre les mois de juillet et d'octobre ainsi qu'une perte de 43,6 p. 100 de la superficie couverte.

Le projet de télédétection présenté dans ce document porte sur la cartographie synoptique de la qualité des eaux à l'aide d'indicateurs naturels comme le carbone organique dissous, les matières en suspension, la chlorophylle a, la turbidité et la couleur. La méthodologie est basée sur une analyse quantitative des variables de la qualité des eau par une approche statistique de régression et de corrélation. L'étalonnage des images a permis d'obtenir une cartographie des concentrations des différents indicateurs de la qualité des eaux. Des cartes des concentrations des indicateurs de la qualité des eaux ont été dressées à partir des résultats obtenus. Nous avons comparé ces résultats aux teneurs mesurées sur le terrain dans le cadre du suivi de NAQUDAT. Le projet a démontré que l'étalonnage des images avec les relevés au sol est bien adapté à l'évaluation quantitative des variables indicatrices de la qualité des eaux.

L'étude de l'hydrodynamique et de la dynamique sédimentaire du lac Saint-François par télédétection constitue un des premiers projets de télédétection réalisés au Centre Saint-Laurent. Le lac Saint-Pierre a été choisi comme zone d'étude à la fois en raison de sa richesse en milieux humides et de la disponibilité de plusieurs images LANDSAT-TM pour ce secteur du fleuve au Centre Saint-Laurent. Ce travail vise donc à : évaluer l'efficacité des images LANDSAT-TM pour cartographier les milieux humides; déterminer la variabilité associée à l'évaluation de la superficie des différents milieux humides en fonction du niveau des eaux, de la saison et des années; déterminer la résolution des classes que l'on peut obtenir à cette échelle cartographique; et, évaluer la possibilité de détecter un changement de superficie d'habitat au moyen des images LANDSAT-TM.

Saskatchewan. Provincial Auditor. Regina : The Auditor, 1997. 9 p.

This special report has been issued by the Saskatchewan Provincial Auditor to advise the Legislative Assembly that SaskPower, the provincial Crown corporation supplying electrical energy in the province, has understated its revenue and net income in its 1996 annual report, and to express concerns about the accounting system used by the corporation. The corporation has been directed by the provincial Cabinet to refrain from reporting a so-called reconstruction charge as income, contrary to the Auditor's opinion, which would have the result of making it difficult to compare the performance of SaskPower relative to other government corporations. The Auditor assesses the appropriateness of Cabinet's direction regarding that accounting rule, presents an opinion on the report of SaskPower's auditor, and makes relevant recommendations.

Summarizes the major modelling projects undertaken to model water quality in the Peace, Athabasca, and Slave river systems. The first section describes the scope of the problem of modelling water quality in large complex systems that are relatively oligotrophic, located at relatively high altitudes, and experience highly seasonal environmental fluctuations. It also provides a summary of the models used to predict key water quality variables. Section 2 gives a general overview of the utility and shortcomings of water quality models, with the goal of establishing key criteria for assessing the successes of models developed by the Northern River Basins Study (NRBS). Section 3 summarizes key findings of the NRBS models and evaluates the results against criteria outlined in section 2. Section 4 presents a series of recommendations for modelling dissolved oxygen, transport and fate of contaminants, and distribution of contaminants in the food chain, along with strategic suggestions for future work.

The second section is a broad overview of major forces behind formation of the rural-urban fringe, including urbanization, and the stages of development of a regional city and its fringes. This is followed by assessment of the costs of fringe development, often associated with urban sprawl. This section first presents findings based on statistical analyses and engineering estimates of hypothetical settlements, with emphasis on two particular studies from the 1970s. The second part examines the benefits and costs of three alternative development patterns in the Greater Toronto Area.

Describes a study of a 40-year-old trembling aspen stand to examine how microclimate influences the regeneration of white spruce and trembling aspen. In the study, openings of various sizes were created in the stand and measurements were made of microclimatological parameters and tree growth parameters. Results presented include solar radiation, soil and air temperature, humidity, and soil moisture in the various types of openings; seedling-water relationships; first- and second-year establishment ratios; effectiveness of vegetation control treatments; daytime patterns in stomatal conductance and transpiration; height and diameter growth; leaf area index; and differences in height between trees with pruned and unpruned roots.

This guidebook first describes the requirements for soil rehabilitation under the British Columbia Forest Practices Code and identifies when rehabilitation plans are required. The objectives of soil rehabilitation include restoring the forest site to a stable condition that will no longer require human intervention to maintain, and re-establishing soil productivity to a level capable of sustaining the production of a crop of trees that is acceptable to the district manager. The second section describes the general format of a rehabilitation plan and what information should be included in the plan. The last two sections detail what types of special concerns associated with particular types of disturbance should be addressed in the rehabilitation plan, and present information on the specific rehabilitation techniques that should be considered for use in a particular plan. Appendices include samples of plans and more detailed information about revegetation techniques.

The first chapter of this study of the changing nature of peacekeeping examines the development and evolution of traditional United Nations peacekeeping as it was shaped by the Cold War era. Chapter 2 reveals how conflict has evolved since then, with special emphasis on the surge in post-Cold War conflicts and the extent to which future conflicts are likely to acquire new qualities. Chapter 3 is devoted to evaluating how United Nations peacekeeping operations have changed in an effort to adapt to the changing qualities of contemporary conflicts. Chapter 4 examines the Somalia mission of 1992-93 in greater detail as a case study of the chapter 3 themes, highlighting several lessons and implications that emerged from this experience. Canadian peacekeeping policy is the focus of chapter 5, which explores the role of peacekeeping in Canadian defence and foreign policy along with the implications of the changing nature of peacekeeping in the Canadian context. Implications of the Somalia experience are highlighted. The concluding chapter highlights central lessons learned and implications for Canada and future United Nations peacekeeping operations.

Investigators collected and analyzed 63 core samples from an area extending up to about 400 metres from shore and about two kilometres downstream from a major industrial pollutant source. Samples were analyzed for a variety of metals, nutrients, and physical parameters. Contaminant concentrations were compared among and within stations using analysis of variance.

Protection of advance growth by careful harvesting methods is attractive for a number of reasons, and offers the potential for lower-cost regeneration of suitable stands. This paper describes a study conducted to evaluate stand and site conditions associated with the abundance and distribution of advance growth at 85 stands located throughout north-eastern Ontario. Data from surveys using replicated, fixed-area plots were combined with information collected during previous research on 320 additional stands. Site and stand factors associated with black spruce and balsam fir advance growth, and relationships of advance growth abundance to forest ecosystem classification (FEC) types, were explored using multiple regression and other analytical techniques. The paper discusses stand and site factors associated with advance growth in relation to forest inventory, FEC information, and to aerial photographs. Keys are provided to assist in recognizing stands with the capability to support abundant black spruce advance growth.

Reports a study conducted to: document the movement patterns of young Blandings turtles (Emydoidea blandingii); and identify areas used by young turtles as rearing grounds and hibernation sites. The study area was located in a park in south-western Nova Scotia. The turtles were hand-reared to an age when they could be fitted with radio transmitters and were then released at four sites, three located on small brooks and the fourth at a small pond. All release sites had boggy floodplain areas dominated by shrubs, grasses, and sphagnum moss. Tagged turtles were tracked daily for the first few days after release to determine whether they would move significantly after release. When determined they would not move significantly, they were positioned by telemetry every 3-7 days and recaptured every 3-14 days. Recaptured turtles were measured and examined to determine their condition. Results are presented and discussed related to turtle survival, movement, predation, behaviour, and habitat use. Dead or dying trees are an important component of wildlife habitat, and estimations of the quality, quantities, spatial distribution, and breakdowns by species and size classes of such trees are needed to assess habitat status and trends. Large scale sampling photos (LSP) suggest an economic alternative to field surveys as a means of collecting such information. This note summarizes a study investigating the potential of LSP for that application. Results are presented for estimation of diameter at breast height from LSP tree measurements, estimation of growth rates using LSP data, and a paired comparison between LSP and field measurements of dead standing and fallen trees.

Particulate material in the water column and in the benthic boundary layer was sampled and examined at stations occupied along transects running north-south and east-west through the planned location of the gravity base structure. In addition, three stations located downstream from the site in the direction of the predicted current drift were occupied for 24 hours with sampling being carried out for 2 hours. Results are presented for the total suspended particulate material, inorganic suspended particulate matter, and disaggregated inorganic size spectra analyses.

Canada's reports to the United Nations Commission on Sustainable Development have reflected growing concern about transportation. The 1996 report included a section entitled "The Challenge of Sustainable Transportation" and noted that the most significant challenge confronting Canadians may be that of making personal transportation more sustainable. The purpose of this monograph is to alert the United Nations General Assembly to the importance of developing a shared vision of sustainable transportation and to start building consensus on the broad direction to take.

Sustainable urban development in Canada, from concept to practice, vol. I : summary report

This study examines how municipal officials interpret the concept of sustainable development, identifies the commonly perceived operational definition of that concept, and also examines the variety of plans, policies, and other tools currently being used to address the issue of sustainable urban development (SUD) and problems or successes that have been encountered in their use. Study methodology involved a survey of 23 municipalities, at least one from each province or territory, and including the largest municipalities in each province or territory and large municipalities with known SUD initiatives. Initiatives are summarized in such areas as planning/development, public works or engineering, parks and recreation, public health, social and community services, interdepartmental co-ordination, energy management, waste reduction/recycling, and environmentally friendly purchasing policies. The final sections review general trends in operationalizing SUD, problems encountered, lessons learned, and directions for future research.

The purpose of preparing this annotated bibliography was three-fold. The first objective was to determine the extent to which previous studies had documented the implementation of sustainable development policies and programs at the urban level. The second objective was to identify current definitions of sustainable development and sustainable urban development that could be used as guidelines for respondents in the questionnaire survey. The third objective was to find and present a few, selected theoretical and methodological references on different aspects of sustainable urban development.

Presents information on detailed responses by municipal officials to a survey on sustainable urban development in Canada. For each city, four sections are provided: the first two record interviews with heads of departments and with city government offices or departments that have significant responsibilities for sustainable development initiatives or that are themselves initiatives. The third describes city government committees or external/public advisory committees with relevant sustainable development initiatives and the fourth describes a selected number of initiatives which were felt to be particularly innovative or relevant for sustainable development. Information presented for each initiative in this section includes: name of organizational unit, address and telephone number of contact person, nature of initiative(s), and comments on challenges encountered and achievements to date.

Ce rapport technique est publié dans le cadre du programme des Zones d'intervention prioritaire du Plan d'action Saint-Laurent Vision 2000. Il dresse un profil des aspects socio-économique du secteur de l'estuaire maritime. Il traite de la ou des ZIP comprises dans le secteur d'étude selon une approche descriptive et analytique. Le territoire d'analyse correspond aux communautés riveraines sises le long de la section du fleuve délimitée par chaque ZIP. Le rapport est élaboré essentiellement à partir d'une synthèse des données historiques et actuelles disponibles, considérées plus pertinentes pour dresser le bilan. Il aborde la ou les ZIP concernées dans une optique d'abord régionale tout en ayant comme unité d'analyse chacune des municipalités comprises dans une ZIP. Il tente également de rendre compte d'une problématique plus particulière, soit celle des zones riveraines.

The Canada Infrastructure Works Program is a national program shared equally by federal, provincial/territorial, and municipal governments, responding to two significant problem areas: the need for repair and renewal of local infrastructure, and the need to accelerate economic recovery and generate jobs. Improvements funded under the program include water and sewer projects, roads and bridges, and municipal and education system buildings. The main focus of this review document is to assess the Program's achievements in relation to its primary goals and to highlight useful lessons learned about the design and delivery of shared assistance programs involving three levels of government. The review process is based on a national data base containing detailed information on Program projects; 30-40 municipal case studies providing details on Program implementation, administration, finances, and impacts; a literature search and other special studies related to estimation of economic impacts; consultation with economic experts and Program stakeholders; and a survey of federal implementing agencies. Program evaluation results are presented, relating to such criteria as the need for infrastructure, project quality, degree of project incrementality, number of jobs created, program design and implementation, effect on public confidence, and economic impacts.

On analyse des données sur les barèmes et les tarifs pratiqués, avec une description des structures tarifaires et des prix de détail qui en découlent à différents endroits du pays. Les autorités municipales, et les responsables de la tarification d'eau pourront en tirer l'essentiel des données dont ils ont besoin pour établir l'efficacité des mécanismes actuels et évaluer le fardeau que représente la facture d'eau pour l'abonné moyen. Au commencement on présente la méthode et les limites de l'analyse. Le chapitre 2 contient une description des principales caractéristiques des barèmes de tarification de l'eau (incitatifs économiques, tarifs forfaitaires, taux fondés sur la consommation, frais d'égout, fréquence de l'utilisation des barèmes de tarifs, tarifs résidentiels moyens et marginaux, comparaisons entre les prix unitaires), et comprend plusieurs calculs de prix. L'accent est mis sur les types de barèmes tarifaires, le prix mensuel total pour les consommateurs moyens et le prix au mètre cube pour les utilisateurs résidentiels et commerciaux. Au chapitre 3 on estime l'investissement futur en immobilisations qui sera indispensable à la prestation de services, et finalement on expose les conclusions et leur signification en matière de politique publique.

Near Baker Lake in 1975-76, a detailed study of drift composition and glacial dispersal was carried out, resulting in collection of about 2,000 till samples for analysis. Since completion of that project, significant improvements in analytical methods have increased the number of elements that can be easily determined and have lowered detection limits. To take advantage of those changes and to further define and expand on the geochemical properties of till in the Baker Lake area, the silt- and clay-sized fraction of the archived till samples were subjected to a second round of geochemical analysis by both inductively coupled plasma atomic emission spectroscopy and instrumental neutron activation analysis. This report begins with a summary of the area's Quaternary geology and the sampling and analytical methods used. It then presents and discusses the geochemical data obtained, comparing the results using the two analytical methods.

Appendices include dot maps of selected element concentrations in till as well as tables of geochemical data.

Explores the nature of the links between the economic characteristics of forest resources and the contribution of the forest sector to Canada's prosperity. The first concept used is economic scarcity, which describes the state of a resource relative to its availability to contribute to the development of an economy. An exploratory statistical analysis conducted on the price of softwood roundwood delivered to Canadian mills is used to reveal long-term trends and indicate whether timber has become scarcer over the past 30 years. International trade theory is used to examine the relationship between the price of industrial timber in Canada and the scarcity of forest products world-wide, as well as the complexity of the relationship between timber scarcity, the industrial forestry sector's contribution to the economy, and Canada's general prosperity and welfare. Potential distortions affecting the Canadian forest sector are also examined in three categories: forest management, market power, and international trade.

After a brief description of the TFL area, this report reviews the principles for determining the allowable annual cut for the area and presents an accounting of the factors and the rationale used in making that determination. These factors include the role of the base-case timber supply forecast, the existing forest inventory, the expected rate of forest growth, the land base contributing to timber harvesting, expected rate of growth, silvicultural treatments, decay and wastage, integrated resource management objectives, harvest flow, and forest industry facilities. Microbiological contamination of fuel aboard ships can be a major problem, notably in water-ballasted ship systems that provide micro-organisms with a fuel-water interface where they can grow readily. This report describes the preliminary design of a full-scale flow-through system for the ultrasonic destruction of micro-organisms in shipboard fuels and ballast waters, as an alternative to the use of biocides which have been both ineffective and environmentally unfriendly. The concept being investigated focuses on the application of ring-shaped piezoceramic transducers that encircle the flow-through fuel volume. Prototype systems were evaluated in the context of effectiveness, relative cost, power consumption, and reliability. The test apparatus represents a single module of a proposed full-scale design. The power supply has features permitting various ultrasonic configurations to be powered at optimum conditions, permitting objective and quantitative comparisons of different configurations using physical and acoustic methods. In addition, a review of shipboard architectures has led to general recommendations for the location and operating methodology of a shipboard system.

This analysis is directed at those who possess knowledge and skills to lay out, fabricate, repair, install, and modify metal assemblies. The analysis identifies tasks and sub-tasks performed by a welder, arranged in blocks of distinct operations relevant to that occupation. These blocks include workplace safety, quality control, fabricating, cutting processes, oxy-fuel processes, arc welding processes, and special processes such as resistance welds, electroslag welds, welding of plastic, and underwater welding. For each task, the document outlines the element of skill and knowledge needed to perform the task adequately, identifies any shifts or changes in technology that affect the task, lists tools and equipment required for the task, and provides an indication of whether the task has been validated by each province and territory. The appendix includes a list of tools and equipment used in the occupation, and a tabulation of the percentage of time a worker spends performing each block and task in a given year (by province/territory and for Canada as a whole). The Westphalian D fossil lepidodendrid forest at Table Head, Sydney Basin, Nova Scotia : sedimentology, paleoecology and floral response to changing edaphic conditions

J.H. Calder...et al. Halifax : Dept. of Natural Resources, 1996. 38 p. : ill., Bibl. In International Journal of Coal Geology : vol. 31, 1996. MICROLOG 97-04710 (1 fiche)

Strata of Westphalian D (Carboniferous) age exposed on the western coast of Sydney Basin on Cape Breton Island expose a fossil forest within a coal seam. This report describes a study that used a multidisciplinary approach to interpret the origins of the coal bed, the depositional history of the site, and the response of the fossil forest to changing soil conditions. This approach sheds light on the environmental preferences and tolerances of the fossilized trees, tree ferns, and seed ferns, and on the floral response to changing conditions that accompanied the transition from peat-forming to clastic wetland. These changes are also considered in the context of autogenic and allogenic controls on the ecosystem as a whole. AP LS NR PR SC

Why tax corporations?

By Richard M. Bird. Ottawa : Dept. of Finance, Technical Committee on Business Taxation, 1996. 24 p. : Bibl. (Working paper / Canada. Technical Committee on Business Taxation ; 96-2) French ed. (Pourquoi imposer les sociétés?) on the same fiche. MICROLOG 97-04322 (1 fiche)

Canada, like every other country, may impose taxes on corporations (1) because it is desirable to do so, (2) because it is necessary to do so to achieve certain objectives, (3) because it is convenient to do so, or for some combination of these reasons. While the distinctions between these three possible rationales of corporation taxes, desirability, necessity, and convenience, are not always sharp, they are explored under these headings in the first three sections of this paper. The fifth section then briefly discusses how corporations should be taxed in light of these various rationales, and the final section considers a few additional factors that seem relevant in deciding upon changes in the level and structure of corporate taxation. Wire screens as a tool for survey measurements of the unattached radon progeny in mines

By Rafael Janica. Ottawa : Atomic Energy Control Board, 1996. xv, 154 p. : ill., Bibl. (Report / Canada. Atomic Energy Control Board ; INFO-0655) MICROLOG 97-04550 (2 fiche)

Short-lived radon progeny carried by ultrafine aerosols, the unattached fraction, deposits readily in the respiratory tract. Measurement of this fraction is therefore very important in estimating radon dose to the lungs. This report describes two methods of measurement for the simultaneous determination of the unattached and the total radon progeny. The proposed methods comply with the criterion of practicality imposed by working conditions in mine environments. Both methods are implemented using standard survey equipment and simple procedures, and use wire screens to collect the unattached fraction preferentially. Experiments and field measurements are described related to the implementation of wire screens as a tool for radon progeny field monitoring. CA EV ND PS SC
